I used to have post exchanges with a guy on another forum and he was aggressive, argued everything, had to have the last word on any topic. He became more aggressive the less I responded, I just could not be bothered arguing trivia with the guy and having every post critiqued. So I just stopped responding. He was, and still is, a very volatile contributor who can not handle people questioning his opinions or positions on speaker design related topics. I stopped bothering with him several years ago. I met him a year or two later, in person, at an audio get together. He was completely different! Mild, amusing, personable, not at all the faceless high strung guy on the Internet. Hiding behind an alias on the Internet changes people, and not always for the better.
