Agreed. Your point regarding the separation of the issue is well taken. Let me just clarify quickly; all creators deserve to realise the fruits of their creations. There is a subjective theory that the more exposure to anything the more the desire to possess that thing increases and consequently the greater the production of that thing. That's where I see the concept of tightly controlled access to be counterproductive. I see it as penny wise, pound foolish. Curious; what about the term "artists" that results in such a strong reaction? Genuinely interested.
