I haven't decided on the name for the new project I have started.Link below shows the design. Looks sort of like the cartona Christmas bottle of booze comes in so I'll call it the Johnny Walker or the Jim Beam. It is small because this is my first ever all scratch builtproject. I bought a couple of handy panels 2' x 4 ' andthe fellow who got my dad's table saw helped me do the cutting. The guy has a jointer too which was real handy with thisstuff. I dry clamped one box together and everything is pretty well squareand everything matches. I had him cutextra fronts and backs in case I screw up the hole makingprocedures. Hole making and everything else will have towait since I haven't got the right tools as of yet. Even though this is an unconventional design it met allthe criteria of having to work in a small space with only2 clamps and transporting panels in a passenger car. I've wanted to use some Tangband and I like the ideaof nearfield speakers for computer use. The small speakerstands I got from PE may work to get them just the right height if they can take the weight. If absolutely nothing works the investment has beensmall. But I am going to tool up when the sales atFather's Day get cooking. That piece from a few monthsago where the guy uses the Rotozip for all the shapingis going to be my guide on these little guys. Lastly, just looking at them, I toyed with the ideaof leaving the bottom open, putting some spikes or somethingon and putting them atop a couple marble tiles which areavailable at the home stores. Maybe Marin King will come back in here and givean opinion on this unconventional idea. lon@athenet.net
