You mention bass response outdoors. it really is much different than indoors, and I use my system alot in both environs. Typically you'll pump alot more power into them to feel your getting the same subjective level, since you are missing room reinforcement. It is dramatic, sometimes. Generally a system that can hold its own outside is a pretty capable system. Nearly all mid size and up venues outside (over, say 4-500 people) use some pretty hefty subwoofers and feed em alot of power. You wouldn't be able to stand it indoors.
