I'm sure there is nothing wrong with the Kappa series. I just didn't feel the need to make so many speakers - There are several in my line already. Each "line" is double the power of the previous line. If efficiency is the same, doubling power is only a few decibels difference, so having lines less than double of each other makes for a lot of overlap in performance. My lines overlap pretty much as it is; To have a line every 100 watts would really be overkill in my opinion. That's the only reason I've skipped the Kappa series.
