O'Kay since you ask; here is my view. I listen to accomplish these goals. Memory/ the remembrance of events tied to the music. Relaxation/to provoke a mood. To transport my thoughts away from the mundane and status quo. Here are my goals; to establish a retreat within my domain where I can sit quietly and absorb the music. The room/system and choice of music integrating into a harmony with my mood and state of mind. The system must be able to relax and enable me to find that connectedness wherein I am lost in the sound. Wheew! The types of equipment that seem able to best create that environment tend to be tube/vinyl/efficient speakers of high quality. So; When something in the chain doesn't do it; it is noticeable and takes away from the effect. Live music is never boring; even if it is not something I prefer. That is the crux of the thing, bad or mediocre equipment is boring and does not involve one in the music. Hence the Bose quote. Regarding sound absolutes. It is not cultural. Were that true than the sound of a nightingale would not be universally appreciated, but would be a cultural phenomenon indigenous to particular cultures. But that song is considered beautiful every where. An acoustic guitar sounds good to all cultures. The style of music will differ but appreciation for the sound of the instrument remains. That is the basis for my contention that there are absolutes in sound. So when you walk by a room and hear some music played; you know if it sounds good or not. Even if you hate the music. That is why I stopped going to meetings of audiophile clubs; they sit staring at some wall of equipment and no one seems able to admit what sounds like crap or what sounds great. They make inane comments about soundstage or lower/upper midrange suckout, but cannot tell if it sounds like music or not. Becoming actively involved in the hobby as you are doesn't seem to me to be a drawback even if it takes away from time to listen or causes one to become sidetracked away from the music. I see the two aspects as representing totally different endeavors. Building and maintaining equipment is a satisfaction all its own. The music and sound offers an entirely separate reward. Regarding how best to pay homage to Miles; maybe just by providing the most musical setting and letting his legacy speak for itself. Good stuff for a quiet holiday full of snow here!
