And if the costume guidelines reflecting 1960's style were to continue into the Next Generation and have elements of our current age, the female crew members would have hip huggers and bare midriffs. I actually think a lot more care is taken with the newer series. It's less broad and not as much scenery chewing. The feature films, with notable exceptions, have been getting better in that there is less 'fan service' (a term used in anime quite a bit) and more story. If the plot lines were written then as they are now, the Borg collective would be a reference to Communism I suppose. I stopped watching tv after the first episode of ST-V, not because I didn't like Voyager, I had just had it with commercial television. I never went back. But now I can watch the content without the advertising.
