All I did to frames was straighten them out when kids slammed into copings, curbs and whatnot. I miss my shop, it was a fun business. Not much money though.:::Framebuilding was fun. I worked for Michael Melton back in 1980. Michael later went on and built the first gen funny bikes for the 84 olympic team. I still have the track tandem that I built in Mike's shop in SC. We took it to the NYC bike show in 1980 and it's been under wraps for the last 26 years... still a virgin.right now I have the hots for a cinelli traditional steel frame... while they are still available. I never worked in a retail bike shop... that takes lot of patience...and other folks have told me.... it's not the place to get rich either :=)If you were a good wheel builder you should be adept at diy'ing amps I would guess. msl
