I don't know; I always assumed we were all proud to know each other; I never thought of it as a selective feeling.As far as what the topic is; your situation is a little different D; you had a war that expressed latent hostilities going back to the dark ages. Here we are being invaded by a neighbor who is profiting from the hard work of our citizens while our own citizens go without healthcare and other amenities. It is the same thing as if Greece decided to flood your country with their citizens against your laws and then take jobs away from you and your people while using your health care for free; your schooling for free and offering nothing in return. No national service; pay no taxes; no investment in our economy. They provide; according to the Pew Charitable Trust figures a net loss of over 3000$ per yr per individual to our country. It's nice to have wonderfull feelings for the world; let me see how you re-act when a hostile group of anti-catholic immigrants decides to demand that your people stop worshipping your way. That might change that happy point of view somewhat.
