
Subject: Re: How would you improve....

Posted by Adveser on Tue, 17 May 2011 04:35:00 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

Radio has been very good to me. I listened to adult contemporary pop music from 1988-1995 as a child, not the last and greatest hits format, but the one that specifically dealt with MOR Pop and 80's hits. Once I hit 10 years old, the format was pretty much dead and was starting its shift into a "classic soft rock" format with whatever ballads were on the charts thrown in. I liked it because I have always liked overproduced, professionally written songs. It's too bad they quit using overdriven guitars, synthesizers and "kitchen sink" production for pop music.

Anyway, If I were to improve radio I would simply organize the stations properly and make them ultra specific. One metal channel is a complete joke that shows no attempt to cater to its fans or really any understanding of it at all.

I would make mini-stations, like one that played absolutely nothing but soft rock from the late 70's to mid-80's. You'd know the type if you heard it. But you play later Chicago, Michael McDonald and Christopher Cross on the same station. If you listened to A LOT of radio at one time or another, you may remember that certain songs were on the playlist for a week and were reasonably only heard 2-3 times in that period. THESE are the songs they need to put back in the rotation. I have a fantastic musical memory that carried around 20-30 songs I heard once or twice that I absolutely loved on the radio that no one would have remembered. That is what people want when they turn on the radio. They want to relive moments like that that may be specifically suited to a singular sound and period.

You just do that with every little niche sub-genre of the many types of pop music and make it where you can easily incorporate what you want to hear into a customized station. If you like AOR, but hate Yacht rock, you aren't likely to listen to a station littered with both.

When it comes to American Rock audiences of the past, there was a thin line of what was acceptable geographically. Hard Rock stations catered to those who did not like conventional pop music. For example, in certain markets a hard rock station means 70's ball busting rock with classics from the 80's included that were not too far off from that attitude and sound. In other places the Beatles, the Grateful Dead, Billy Joel and Elton John are considered classic rock, something that you would never hear in another place. I lived in VA which took the softer attitude and in Florida which took the heavier one. In Florida Rock fans were definitely not interested in anything that would have ever been played on the pop or the "Fred FM" station.

None of their problems are insurmountable, they just need to realize that radio depending on the station and time was usually providing something unique to its era. I turned my radio off when pop music became more about novelty than songwriting. They still couldn't program a station that covers the type of pop I like. Until they can work that out, no one will really care because I am sure no one actually wants the top hits from a specific decade or broad blanketed genre.
