To be clear, I'm of the opinion that quite a few engineers took all of this into consideration and designed the speakers to operate with a screen.

In other words, the entire thing can't be summed up with a generality. I've seen my ex-roommate drape a thin hand towel in front of the tweeters on my speakers. He had his own vintage high-fi himself, a real one, unlike mine that is reversed engineered from the source to be as close to tonally accurate as possible. If he felt that the practice knocked off a double db from the tweeter and the distortion wasn't an issue, I didn't see the problem either.
