we have over 500 VHS cassettes and we too are starting to rebuild with DVD. There has to be some way to connect the VCR to the computer to burn a DVD. We have a DVD burner on my husband's system. I have noticed a lot more of my favorite movies on DVD now in the dollar bins. What I need to get are the good copies of my favorites like The Nuns story, the Odd Couple, Sunshine boys. I like the movies of the 40s, 50 and some from the 60s. I am not so sure that the DVD will go out as quickly as the VHS. Of course the VHS had a long history as well. If you think about it you can put two or three movies on one DVD and keep your collection small. I don't think worrying about what will come down the pike next is something to consider, I think just keeping the movies in any collection is the most important thing. Now I was wondering about the game memory chips that can hold movies as well... making duplicates in cross media might solve the question. at least you've covered a few fronts that way. julie
