Hi, I highly second Wayne's thoughts on all the pitfalls of audio measurement. Over the past few years I have discovered that in audio (sound) measurements everything in the entire room and signal chain matters. Additionally how you measure is a huge factor. I use a PC and calibrated microphones but even then they don't give the whole picture. Just envision a very bumpy road and it will give you an idea of what the readouts look like. They can give you some clues to what needs changing, but my experience is that the final verdict is dependent on your ears.
