Hi, sort of part one of two... The original posting was part a pat on the back, but more importantly provide stimulus for others to see how they might excel as well. I was at the same time reflecting on how forums in general have a positive influence on individuals. I sure have benefited. Even though I have dabbled in electronics for about 60 years now, I still learn new stuff. Before forums, it didn't occur to me to share much of my thoughts and designs with anyone. After them, the benefits were two fold. One, folks looked at my ideas and two, I looked at theirs. Additionally, back and forth questions made both of us better. In me it forced introspection. Just why did I do something in a design? Is there another or better way? Forums give me another thing I believe important. I like to encourage others to try stuff. Expand their abilities and learn. Forums provide this venue. Keep on soldering,
