Thank you Wayne. They're really better up close. These were done professionally in a car paint place and they were baked as well. It was free of charge as well because a friend of a friend owns the place.

The funniest part was that on top of the paint for these a rather fancy lacquer was used. I instructed him to use the least amount of material possible and he used a lacquer that can produce a coating in very few microns, I really can't remember the number. He told me that they use that only on race cars in which even the smallest amount of weight counts. I found that both interesting and very funny at the same time considering the way it's used here.
