I say go with your budget and check on the quality of the speaker before buying it. You can also ask advice from the seller as that person can give you a better idea.
It is all about the quality. I don't bother asking sellers for tips on the bedr gears to get when I visit their shops, I do my due diligence online by asking those who use similar products before I go shopping. That way, I am sure of what I am trying to get.
Well, George, I totally get why you skip the sellers, but I am still of the view that it is not all good.

I've been in situations where I got valuable hints about certain subwoofers from the shop guys who's gotten real reviews from buyers on a daily basis. I am not disregarding the fact that quality matters a lot, but there are situations where I've been told an issue that I never knew might exist about a product from the sellers when I interacted with them.

I would want to know if you've ever tried chatting with a seller after doing your research? I mean, there is no harm in making enquiries or have you had an ugly experience from asking?
