George Carlin died of a heart attack Sunday.  The guy was sharp as a tack, cynical but not angry and seemed always to go straight to the point.  When he had his sights on something, he would ridicule it fiercely, but did it in a way that made you laugh.  He'll definitely be missed.Everyone remembers the FCC indecency declaration of the "seven dirty words", so I think it is ironically fitting to link to his webpage on the VOA:

I think he did a great job opening people's eyes about religion.  His frank teasing of it was funny, because what he was saying about it was the truth!
