By: Steve on Sunday, August 6th, 2006 at 1:08 PM - PDTIt's been about 48 hours since Democrats on the House Judiciary Committee issued a sweeping indictment of the Bush administration's casual approach to law-breaking in a report called, "The Constitution in Crisis." How's the media reaction been?Using Lexis-Nexis and Google News, it appears that the only mainstream media outlet — literally, the only one — to even mention the release of the report was CNN, when Jack Cafferty devoted 200 words to the subject late last week.
Why do they hate America?

They will now quote from the ten-thousand blogs that disagree; they will produce endless irrelavant "Facts" that can't be validated except by themselves and most of all they will not give a damn one way or the other; they already got what they want.It's a culture of guys who think they are the smartest people in the room and everyone else is either hopelessly ignorant or they are doing easy work or they are arrogant if their arguments cannot be refuted. The word humble never entered their vocabulary. Those are the scary ones.

I'll tell you this - it's very well written. Not the usual "all around the mulberry bush" routine. Clear languange, and logically presented.I've wondered how somebody could pull together the mass of stuff that's already in the public record in a coherent way - seemed way too difficult for the likes of me - but they did very well.

Yep; just a little intro and you can see the quality of the writing. Have you noticed the bookshelves in the big chain book stores are slowly filling up with critical works of some authenticity regarding this administration?Maybe a siesmic shift ahead in policy as times get tougher as a result of the neglect and incompetence of these guys?Any good recomendations?
