Subject: Do you like room calibration rather than getting expensive home theater device?

I've seen folks get hyped about new speakers, AV receivers, and subs, but I think many underestimate room calibrations for our systems.

My gear can still disappoint if my speakers are not in top condition or my room's acoustics off. I know many of us won't want to spend hours measuring and tweaking their sound system setup. But it seems that is different with new devices.

So, how much time do you spend calibrating your home theater after getting a new gear? Have you ever gotten better results from calibrating than getting expensive gears?
