

---

Subject: Blurred Lines Banned at UK Universities
Posted by audioaudio90 on Fri, 20 Sep 2013 12:26:11 GMT
View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

---

The song Blurred Lines has been banned at Leeds and Edinburgh, at least from public play at university facilities. While I really hate the lyrics of that song, I don't think banning it is a great idea; it just makes people want to listen to it more.

---

---

Subject: Re: Blurred Lines Banned at UK Universities
Posted by gofar99 on Fri, 20 Sep 2013 22:20:15 GMT
View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

---

Hi, IMHO, banning something is the very best way to generate interest in it. Publishers just love it.

---

---

Subject: Re: Blurred Lines Banned at UK Universities
Posted by Nymeria on Mon, 30 Sep 2013 14:21:47 GMT
View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

---

Bruce has a good point. Banning something makes for good publicity. That particular song is awful but man, it's catchy. I've caught myself humming along to it.

---

---

Subject: Re: Blurred Lines Banned at UK Universities
Posted by Gentry on Sun, 06 Oct 2013 22:32:48 GMT
View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

---

A lot of people catch themselves humming along at first. The next thing they know they're singing along, not even thinking about the words that are coming from their mouths. Unfortunately, that is what makes music so powerful and such a huge impact on people. So much so that it can impact a person's behavior.

---

---

Subject: Re: Blurred Lines Banned at UK Universities
Posted by Round2 on Mon, 14 Oct 2013 23:30:43 GMT
View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

---

Wow I just read the lyrics and I am not too impressed with it. Not something I want my child to sing to. Yes, banning a song generates more interest but I'm guessing they don't want those lyrics blaring across their campus.

---