I have started to use my laptop for more serious transfer of LPs to digital. My experience has been that any rate below 24 bit /96K is unsatisfactory. 24 / 192 is better. The problem has been that there was not enough memory to do this well. The files get really large. Its a dual core with 4 gb. So I ordered a pair of chips for 8 gb. They sent ones for a Mac. Oops and didn't have PC ones. Return and refund time. Ordered another pair from Amazon. Right chips, didn't work. Contacted Amazon. Yes there was some problem with that batch. Return and refund time again. Finally saw a pair at Best Buy when looking for something else. Same price as he others and wow they work and wow the laptop does the job OK. This seems to becoming an ever more common problem. Ordering things and finding them incorrect for some reason.

Has anyone else noticed this problem or are the hidden forces of the universe singling me out?

I generally have good luck with Amazon. Maybe they have your account flagged. I'm sorry you had such a bad experience but at least Best Buy came to the rescue.

Gofar99, I'm not sure what they have against us. I certainly didn't think that I had ever done anything to offend anyone. Every time I order something online I hold my breath because something always goes wrong. Needless to say I don't order on line very often.

Hi, I think they struck again today. I ordered a new copy of a LP that got damaged. The replacement is coming from a store in Tucson AZ. I actually shop there on occasion. I live about 75 miles away. It was ordered through Amazon. When they confirmed the order it said the estimated delivery date was between October 2 and October 18! Wow, I can walk there in three days. Maybe they use the Post Office. The PO just took 18 days to get a package from Detroit to here. It sat in their regional distribution center for 14 of them. It only moved after I filed a complaint and so did Stamps.com (we use them for commercial shipping) Maybe my LP is going there. If I really believed the estimated delivery dates, I would cancel the order and just use the excuse to drive there. If it hasn't been shipped in two days I will cancel.
