Here in the south, Georgia became the butt of quite a few jokes after being crippled by just a few inches of snow last week (or week before last?). Well, we're due for more snow again this week and the governor has taken preemptive action by declaring a state of emergency for basically the whole northern half of the state. Seems like we've gone from one extreme to the other -- from not doing enough or soon enough to doing too much too soon.

Thoughts?

Well, I am also in Georgia and I think that the governor did the right thing. We didn't have anyone stranded on the interstate this time although we did have millions without power.

If the Farmer's Almanac long range forecast is right we can expect to do this again at the end of February.
