I guess I'm hard on my earbuds. Ever since I started working out more regularly, I go through them more often. Usually the wire gets exposed where it attaches to the stereo plug and then I start losing signal in one or both sides. Maybe I need to find more durable ones instead of making do with the junk from Walmart.

I don't know if I'd start buying more expensive ear buds just yet. I have bought the cheap ones as well as the more expensive ones and it seems like the "life time" is about the same either way.

Oh well that's not great news. Don't they make any specifically for athletes that might last longer? It would probably help if I were not so clumsy. I frequently accidentally catch the cord on the machines.

Wireless earbuds are the best alternative that you've got to consider. Some brands like Apple Brands are good and have features like the noise cancellation system that makes you work out seamlessly and enjoyable. You can consider getting one from them, and you will be glad you did.
