If you had your choice, where would you live? The city? As in a metropolis over 1 million people, or the country? Someplace so backwoods that you see the squirrels more than your neighbors.

I like squirrels.....they're cute and they know how to stock up for the winter. People though? You can't count on them to do the right thing and they're too removed from the workings of nature.

I think I'll take the squirrels.

I would much rather live in the country than the city. I currently live in a smaller town but I still have neighbors. They are very nosy, so I think I would rather live where there are only animals to bother me.

I live in a small town and the neighbors are pretty nice. Still I would go for the country if the opportunity came up.

I have spent years living in big cities with advanced technology so honestly, I can't really imagine living in simplicity. Maybe I will consider it when I get older, but current work and daily activities demand so much that I can't imagine living in countryside.
