If you saw a famous person in a store or a bar, how do think you would handle it? Would you be too nervous to approach them, or would you just walk up and say hi?

I would probably just talk to them the way I would anyone else. I don't look at stars as being anything special. They're normal people with interesting jobs.

All depends on who the star is. If it were Tom Cruise I would avoid him like the plague. If it were Will Smith I'd buy him a drink and tip my hat.

I often imagine myself meeting my idols and we can have a casual talk, with his/her special signature on my T-shirt, and great photos. I would probably too busy being in awe if I actually meet them, though.

I think it depends on whether or not you and the star connect. Have you ever met a famous person and he or she greeted you first? How did it feel? I wouldn't walk over to a famous person if it isn't for an autograph because it can seem intrusive at times.

Hi A lot depends on the circumstances. I have met several through my long ago employment and they are just like anyone else as someone above noted...they just have jobs that we tend to see as more interesting. Personally I would rather not be famous.

I think it really depends on the circumstances and the star's persona. Most of them loathe publicity and will prefer to keep a low profile. At times, it is good to just let them enjoy their privacy.
