I don't see many people talk about these speakers but are they that pricey? There has been talk of these resulting in a correct spectral balance, leading to fatigue-free listening in the long-term.

I've never considered such speakers before and I'm just wondering how much they'd cost? All I've heard is that they can reproduce lower frequencies correctly.

Those sound like speakers that could possibly add a little excitement to life, although I do also think that they would certainly come with a massive price tag.

Well, I did a little research on this topic. I didn't know they made them. These are also custom made for the room they are in. The Swarm received The Absolute Sound Editors Choice award for 2017 in Subwoofer category. There is a picture of "The Swarm" on <http://www.audiokinesis.com/>. Interesting reading.

Sounds really cool. I never thought of Audiokinesis speakers but I would guess that they have amazing capabilities. There are some very cool products out now but you better have a huge wallet to go with your interest.

I hear you, Ziggy. I do have to ask, though. Why would anyone want to go to all that trouble. What exactly is the benefit of owning such speakers for ordinary people like us?
