
Subject: Learning without a real life teacher
Posted by mamoss on Thu, 10 Jan 2019 18:59:11 GMT
View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

Almost everything is now available online with YouTube being one of the best ways to learn how to play an instrument. All the same, setting aside some amount of time isn't always easy. A combination of both seems like the easier way out.

Subject: Re: Learning without a real life teacher
Posted by musicluvr on Fri, 11 Jan 2019 05:19:19 GMT
View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

Depending on the instrument and your own innate talent, I think you can learn the basics alone. Pitch, tempo, and things like that are better mastered with a teacher though.

Subject: Re: Learning without a real life teacher
Posted by sawyer25 on Sun, 13 Jan 2019 15:03:00 GMT
View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

I learned the piano on my piano but it was so difficult to do the same with the guitar in mind. Like musicluvr says, a lot of this has to do with how far your own innate talent can take you.

Subject: Re: Learning without a real life teacher
Posted by TheWanderer on Thu, 17 Jan 2019 17:27:58 GMT
View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

YouTube can take you pretty far but to actually get good, I think you need a teacher. Someone to give you feedback on how you're playing. We all know someone who thinks they're amazing at doing something but the reality is quite different. :lol:

Subject: Re: Learning without a real life teacher
Posted by Porter on Thu, 31 Jan 2019 19:59:50 GMT
View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

I've seen the commercials for learning guitar on your own in no time and figured it was probably a money waster. Maybe it's possible to learn that way if you already have a foundation in reading music and playing to pitch.

Subject: Re: Learning without a real life teacher
Posted by mamoss on Sat, 09 Feb 2019 08:48:58 GMT

TheWanderer wrote on Thu, 17 January 2019 11:27 YouTube can take you pretty far but to actually get good, I think you need a teacher. Someone to give you feedback on how you're playing. We all know someone who thinks they're amazing at doing something but the reality is quite different. :lol:

That is a very good point because review and feedback is a good way of gauging how well we are doing. The point is that the real teacher has to be available and both willing and able to get the best out of a student.

Subject: Re: Learning without a real life teacher
Posted by Jazzy on Tue, 12 Feb 2019 03:24:29 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

musicluvr wrote on Thu, 10 January 2019 23:19 Depending on the instrument and your own innate talent, I think you can learn the basics alone. Pitch, tempo, and things like that are better mastered with a teacher though.

I agree with this comment. We can learn how to read notes and how to play them, but there are parts of music that only a music teacher can teach us. However, there are people who are really gifted that they learn just by watching other people's performance.

Subject: Re: Learning without a real life teacher
Posted by Madison on Thu, 09 May 2019 21:50:04 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

I was looking for a child's birthday gift and ran across this smart device that's supposed to help you learn to play the keyboard. If it really works and the learner is dedicated, this could be much cheaper than hiring a teacher for lessons. That's especially true if you're just starting out, since you'll just be learning the basics and might not need a teacher until you face more difficult material. That would also let a person get a feel for the instrument to determine whether the player enjoyed it before investing more heavily and going all-in. Do you guys think you could learn this way?

Subject: Re: Learning without a real life teacher
Posted by drake on Sun, 12 May 2019 07:27:20 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

Teacher or no teacher, the bottom line is that without dedication, no single person can master how to play an instrument. I know a lot of people who are self-taught and the common denominator is that they were willing to spare at least 30 minutes each day. They also utilized a lot of online resources, most of which didn't cost anything!

Subject: Re: Learning without a real life teacher
Posted by Echo on Sun, 30 Jun 2019 09:01:51 GMT
View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

I think it depends on the person and how committed they are to learn the instrument on their own. I tried online piano classes and found that I did not have enough motivation to do that. It was only after I hired a private tutor that I started seeing some progress.
