In the spirit of customer service, would soothing music at a bus stop be appreciated by the bus riders? The speakers and Bluetooth connectivity would be set up and maintained by whatever transit authority the city has.

I think it would. Although I personally always walk around with my headphones and my music on. But I think it would be a good idea.

It's a novel idea, but what about vandalism? Unless they can protect the speakers from being damaged, I don't see any city trying it. That, and they won't get any money back from the money they spend.

I think it would be a great idea but who would pick the style of music? Maybe every hour change the style, or something like that. I agree with the other people here in that they would have a hard time protecting it.

Let the riders pick it. Make a site where people can go to make suggestions. I don't know how the connectivity would work though. All the bus stops are on the same "channel"? Different channels per zip code?

We'll have to work out the details of that.

It's a good idea for relaxation, and I think it will provide a decent vibe for anyone waiting for the bus. I bet not everyone will have earphones going out, so having some music for the public would be great.
