It's pleasant, but the song sounds unfinished, and I also don't know what to think of the AI in both music and video. One of the reasons I loved The Beatles: Get Back series is watching and hearing the group trying to shape bits of songs, on the spot, even when things got repetitive.

What do you think?

Not one of their hit singles. I think it's more a nostalgic sentiment to the way they were. Good for anyone who really is a big fan.

I think it's great. I'm not a huge Beatles fan, but I do enjoy their music and play it from time to time. This one is going into my YouTube favorites.

It's a bit of a dud. Where's the passion? Where's the soul? I'm only interested in the original members in a real band, playing their hearts out. The use of AI is fascinating, and I accept that it's here to stay, but it just sounds so dull and lifeless.

Ironic, isn't it? Because of touring being out of the question for them, they turned to studio electronics to experiment with different sounds and ways of producing music. One of the first bands to ever do that.

Now 60 years later, they're doing it again in the form of AI.

Now and Then, indeed.

It's far from their highest high. I can see why the song stayed hidden for such a long time.

As I grow older, though, the nostalgia hit harder as I listened a few more times. I also see a bunch of people just loving music even after all these years. At least the song brings a little smile and warmth with it.

Hi, Not the best of their work. I actually think it detracts from their legacy. They were special...this work isn't. YMMV. I remember the early days. I saw the Ed S show (I was a senior in HS). My parents couldn't understand why Ed let them ruin a perfectly good program. So much for generational differences.

I've long had a personal comical fantasy thought of the late great actor Gary Cooper singing the Beatles song, Love Me Do. Or Clark Gable doing Twist and Shout. I'd pay a dollar for that.

Not bad. Don't like it enough to download, but I wouldn't switch to another radio station if it came on.

It's cool that The Beatles still get so much attention.

I used to be a big fan of The Beatles when I was a teenager, but not anymore. I enjoy listening to other types of music nowadays. However, this song reminded me of those days. I enjoyed it.

"It's cool that The Beatles still get so much attention." I sort of think that there is not enough new stuff of merit that would last that long. I may have a rose colored view, but it seems that the 60-70s and some 80s were the mayday of recorded music. Vintage classical music and show tunes excepted.

AI should be kept as a niche product for niche purposes, but I'm afraid it's already a runaway train.

I never was a huge Beatles fan and this song isn't going to change my mind.

I watched this last night on PBS. Deconstructing The Beatles. A Trip Through Strawberry Fields. Very nice small documentary.
https://www.pbs.org/video/a-trip-through-strawberry-fields-i3bqel/

All the takes they did, the instruments used, like the Mellotron and the final splicing of two versions with different tempos that John wanted for the final cut. That George Martin exclaimed was impossible but John said he had faith he could. And he and his engineer partner did. Today would be easily done with digital recording but then it was literally cutting audio tape and matching the point in the song seamlessly.

Nothing to get hung about mate. Strawberry Fields Forever.

Yeah, I get what you mean. The song sounds nice, but it really does feel a bit unfinished, like it's missing that last spark. And the AI part in the music and video is kind of strange to me too. I like seeing real people actually make things, like in The Beatles Get Back, where you can watch them mess around and slowly turn little ideas into a full song.

AI music can be cool because it can do things really fast, but sometimes it feels like it doesn't have much emotion behind it. I'm not totally against it, but I don't think it hits the same way as something a real band creates.
