I generally don't care for cop shows. There's a whole slew of them. My older bro. told me about a cop show years back called Bosch that at the time was pay per view. Guess its old enough now to be a freebee on the Roku box. I've watched all 7 seasons now and on the postmortem "legacy" season. Set in contemporary LA, LAPD detective Harry Bosch, (whose named after the Dutch painter Hieronymus) by his prostitute mother who was murdered. Setting him off on a career solving the seamy side of life's dirty deeds.

It's a very well made look into the practices of bringing nerdowells to justice. More nuanced than old Jack Webb's, "just the facts ma'am". Including departmental politics and city hall politics. Harry Bosch is hard nosed and high standard, and expects the same with his partner and colleagues. Harry's got a penchant for Jazz too, and listens exclusively to vinyl on his Marantz turntable, Ohms Walsh speakers and a McIntosh tube amp when he's brooding about a case in his hilltop home overlooking the big city of LA sprawled out with twinkling lights in the night.

Kelly and I love that series! We've watched every one of 'em, all the way through the latest Legacy episode. Can't wait for the next season to drop!

I know what I'm bingeing this weekend. Thanks for the tip! Bosch looks like a good one.

If you're into true-crime, you should check out the many shows about the Murdaugh family in South Carolina. The family is utterly fascinating. One such movie is available for free on Tubi right now.

I understand this is the last season for the series. Having seen it, I hope that's true. Because I'd like the series to end on a high note. Going any further with it now without a very good and prominent character would be hard to keep the quality intact I think.

No spoilers, but the death of the character, not Bosch, was one of my favorite in the whole series.
My least favorite character was Bosch's daughter. She just didn't make a believable cop.

Totally agree. I liked most of the characters, but the daughter didn't seem a good fit.

Kelly and I have this last season in our queue - next to start watchin' it. We can't wait!
