We still have the old type speakers with wires, but we have been considering upgrading them. The other half though that wireless was the way to go. I'm not too sure and would love your input.

I'm not understanding what you mean, like are you talking about speakers for your computer or are you talking about speakers for your surround sound. I didn't know that speakers were wireless. I thought all of them came with wires. I must have been mistaken. But I did find some wireless, speakers called acoustics research AW-871 main stereo speakers. So I guess there are some wireless speakers out there. I need to upgrade myself.

I like Bose actually, they are a nice set of speakers. The sound that the give off are excellent. They sound extra crisp when they are inbetween some book son a book shelf.

They are a bit sexpensive to though but I mean if you want quality then they would be your best bet.

How much do those speakers run? I'm not trying to spend over a couple hundred for speakers.

You aren't going find them anywhere under a couple of hundred unless you get them used or refurbished.

You can check out ebay and see if you can find them on there. I have run across alot of pro audio equipment on ebay that were in great shape and fairly priced.

I'm looking into the same thing. I have old wired Cerwin-Vega brand speakers. My amplifier is starting to go out so I am looking at replacing the entire system. I have heard great things about Bose speakers but honestly they are out of my price range. Where would I look to find professionally refurbished ones? I would have no problem compromising with that option. Thanks for your help.

I would avoid Bose at all costs. For that rice JBL mops the floor with them. I consider them the worst speaker brand in existence bar none.

I wouldn't hook up wireless either unless it is sending a bit-for-bit digital signal from the amp/source to the speaker.

I believe the original question was about wired versus wireless speakers. Wireless speakers are more expensive because, in addition to the speakers themselves, you are paying for a transmitter, a receiver and a dedicated amplifier for each speaker. They are useful in some surround sound applications because they solve the problems of running wires to the surround speakers in some rooms. In reality, to make them affordable manufacturers usually use very cheap electronics connected to underperforming speakers.

You will get the best performance for your money using wired speakers from a name brand speaker manufacturer such as Klipsch, Infinity, JBL, Polk, etc. Also be aware that there's a huge difference in the sound quality of each of these brands' least expensive speakers versus the more pricey models. You don't always get what you paid for, but you never get what you didn't pay for.

I beg to differ sir, I have 140 bucks in my system, not counting my computer.

Add another 100 for the headphones.

Yeah, that looks ugly. At least cheap junk is advertised as such more or less. I always have to bring up when someone mentions Bose who reviews them. Companies they advertise with that are not audio publications and that do not have a single person qualified to test speakers or has the ear training to do so on staff.

I wouldn't trust consumer reports to tell me what which Guitar or amp to buy and this is pretty much the parallel with Bose.
