Most of the better high-resolution televisions have SVGA and/or XGA inputs. Just look for "SVGA" or "XGA" in the list of features. Some also have a "MAC" connector, so look for that if you're running a Macintosh.

My Samsung plasma hooks up to my computer. I use my laptop as DVD player and use my plasma TV as screen. Quality is perfect.

There are currently a large number of plasma tvs available on the market which can be used for a number of different applications including presentations, home video and computer uses. Don't you know that you can hook up an XGA computer to an SVGA plasma?

My father-in-law has a 37" Viewsonic that has a connection for a computer. I'd love to plug my laptop into it and see how it looks.

I have a Samsung that also works on my computer too, and the quality is very impressive.

Ok so is this tv the only thing hooked to your computer. Meaning it's not an extra add on or anything like that. It's replacing your monitor

Now how would you hook your laptop up to that. I thought you would only do that with your home computer, that way you can un hook the monitor.

If you aren't running a Mac then are you capable of using any other screen that you choose for your computer?

I haven't used it yet, but my laptop has a connection for an external screen. I think you have to do a couple keystrokes to activate it. And it looks like the TV has a similar input, that corresponds to the input selection page onscreen. I assume it's for people who want to use the laptop, but don't mind springing for a larger monitor when they're in one place for a while.

ARE you asking if you can use any type of screen for your computer? If so, you can use any type of screen or monitor for your computer.
