DVRs have dropped in price lately. I am going to be purchasing a new TV also so I was wondering if anyone had any tips on picking a good DVR. Thanks

I'd look at disk size, quality modes, recording time, input and output formats and options.

I always go for the whole look first, because I am so into coordination BUT, you want to check out the features and make sure it suits the needs of you. Not everyone can share the same dvd and be happy.

We've had a Pioneer DVR from Costco for a few months now. It also has the option of burning to DVD, and it's forty gigs. So far it's been great. I wouldn't normally go out of my way for a Pioneer, but it compared favourably to the other options in the store and it was kind of an impulse purchase that's working out fine.

I was wondering if you knew the answer to this as stupid as it may sound. Do you have to get a DVR through a company like Dish Network for it to work? Or can you just buy one and use it?
Thanks

I actually have a pioneer and I enjoy it. I have had mine for about a year now. It has an onscreen media guide and 80gb hard drive.

I like the pioneer models. They seem to be a reliable piece of equipment that I would like to own. I would buy a pioneer.Crystal

We got our DVR through At&t so I'm not really sure what brand it is. We can record up to four programs at a time and watch them on as many televisions as we want.

Dang, four? I can record one which is okay since our TV slots seem to work out for the best, but four. I know a while back I think we had Dish Networks? and we could do 2 at a time but that was it.

I would also look at what connections in, and out that it has available. I always want USB, and the recent one I bought has it, but stupidly its not operational. Apparently its just there for 'future proofing' and all it will do is charge my iPhone.

Honestly, it's not easy to find the best DVR especially if you want a reasonable price, popular brand and very good quality. Luckily, I've got TiVo at home. The features are cool and very easy to use. Last night, I transfered my recordings to the computer. Awesome!
