Interesting non-scientific study - Beethoven at the top, and jazz near the bottom.....C

Jazz was near the bottom probably because there was only one person who listened to it.

All jokes aside, I think there is a causal relationship but it may be that the cause/effect ends are backwards. In other words, listening to some of the music at the lower end of the scale might not make you dumb, but it might just be more popular with the kinds of people that place less emphasis on academic pursuits, know what I mean? I also remember hearing that classical music played to young children and even those still in the womb (with pillow speakers for mom's belly) tended to make children smarter. This might be kind of the same thing, that children with parents that care enough to try this might also be more nurturing, interested parents. Could be the environment is better, not just the music. Or it could be that the patterns in the music, the complex mathematical relationships, or maybe even just the stimulus causes better neural growth. I know that children that are deprived of stimulus don't develop as well, so this may be related to that.

The jazz might be "real" or "smooth". Two totally different sides of the world. I've found the folks that listen to bebop and other forms of traditional jazz to be pretty sharp. No science to back it up, though.
