Wayne, I've been going through the threads here, very interesting. Was wondering if you or some of the other contributors ever considered a speaker design that would lend itself to near field monitoring in audio post production? Most near fields strive for a pretty flat response which allows bad mixing (that would be me) to be immediately heard without coloration from the speaker. I'd love to hear your thoughts on this, thanks.

Thanks for the response Wayne, but I don't see a Pro Series 3 listed on the site either as a kit or a complete speaker.

I just finished design and testing. Plans are available and they've been discussed on this forum, but they aren't listed on the website yet. I can send you the plans if you're interested.

Have you tried them with your Paramours? I noticed the 2206 has a 95dB efficiency.

I sold the Paramours. But I've listened to them on a couple other SET amps and they sound great, even with just one watt.

Wayne,I'm replacing the studio Pi Two's- my son's taking them to college. Am figuring these will not give quite as much bass as the 2 Pi's- is that correct? If I got these, I'd build a sub later and have killer sound, or go with one of the Four Pi models instead of all that? Hope you're having a Happy Fourth- gotta go grill Red, White & Blue burgers (roquefort cheese inside the meat!).Cheers,Matts so if the regular Studio Two in quarter space in my room has sufficient bass, then the Pro Three would have slightly deeper bass at same volumes?

Good problem to have. Sounds like these Pro Three's may be a very good option for me... or any of the Fours... or the Theatre Three's.... Have 'til the end of the month to decide!
