Without going into all the bloody details (figuratively or literally) this new film with Brad Pitt as the Beaver was a huge waste of time. This is how boring it was: during the film I was going out online looking for cheesecake photos of Helen and Andromache. OTOH, there's this small film made in the European market or for tv and distributed to vid stores that I thought was a better product.

Helen of Troy

I thought it was alright, but there were soooo many others playing at the same time. The History Channel was running a version and two were out in the theaters all at about the same time. So I kinda overdosed on the Trojan Horse thing. And what's with making all the Helens so plain? She was supposed to be a babe, not Olive Oil or something.

The only good thing that came out of all this was that I recalled seeing the film version of The Trojan Women by Euripides and starring Katherine Hepburn. No, I didn't find it as an obscure library listing, it was on the shelf at Blockbuster way back when. When I remembered it, I requested my library to add it to its collection of plays. It's in a current Kino Video version on dvd. Also that Helen O' Troy I mentioned _is_ stocked by the local library. I was going to re-rent and was surprised to see it turn up. All these big war adventures got triggered by the upsurge of nationalism after 911. I'll bet my shirt on it. But to give some historical distance, they picked antiquity and made Troy and Alexander the Great. I'm getting weary of these CGI "cast of hundreds of thousands" epics. There's that haze you can always see in the CGI images that says "fake". No good s-f films being made, so now that I have a dvd player, I'm catching up on Star Trek Voyager episodes.

I've been meaning to pick up the original series on DVD. I must have seen each one a dozen times, but sometimes I feel like watching a particular episode again. It would be great to have it handy on DVD."Damnit Scotty, if we don't have warp drive in five minutes we're all dead!"

I remember reading the Making Of Star Trek book and backon TOS (The Original Series) the costume designer wrote about how he worked in as much cheesecake as he could for the alien babes. Even the terra babes on the crew had short skirts. In the revival series' they took an absolutely Puritan approach in the 80's. Then came Jeri Ryan as Seven Of Nine in ST-V (Star Trek Voyager.) Still, there seems to be a consistent pattern of keeping sex out of the program-- unlike the rest of tv and unlike ST-TOS. The future isn't what it used to be.

You know, I never thought about it but I think you're right. Certainly, the original Star Trek regularly had a love interest for Kirk, and she was always a babe. And there was always Ensign Rand too. Seemed like all alien women were dolls, maybe that's why so many people are fascinated with ET's Original Star Trek Cast Ensign Janice Rand. The next generation Star Trek might have been more conservative, but there was always the tension between Deanna Troi and Commander Riker. That and her cleavage spiced things up a bit. And sometimes they would throw in a little chemistry between Dr. Crusher and Captain Picard too. Next Generation Cast Deanna Troi

And if the costume guidelines reflecting 1960's style were to continue into the Next Generation and have elements of our current age, the female crew members would have hip huggers and bare midriiffs. I actually think a lot more care is taken with the newer series. It's less broad and not as much scenery chewing. The features films, with notable exceptions, have been getting better in that there is less 'fan service' (a term used in anime quite a bit) and more story. If the plot lines were written then as they are now, the Borg collective would be a reference to Communism I suppose. I stopped watching tv after the first episode of ST-V, not because I didn't like Voyager, I had just had it with commercial television. I never went back. But now I can watch the content without the advertising.

I was impressed with Roddenberry's ability to put a friendly face on people of cultures that many Americans viewed in a lesser sense, sometimes as lower class and sometimes as faceless enemies. Navigator ensign Pavel Chekov was a Russian who was patriotic and proud of his heritage. This is remarkable, since most Americans saw Russians with distrust in 1968. Lieutenant Sulu was a very capable crew member, and he was Japanese. This coming only 20 years after WWII, when most Americans still saw Japanese with contempt, and considered all Japanese products to be only slightly better than nothing at all. Lieutenant Uhura was the dependable and sexy communications officer at a time when America was torn up with race riots in every city. Everyone on the bridge had distinct cultural heritage that they were proud of and each respected the unique qualities of the others.

ST-TOS was a landmark show. So much so that people never forgot it and initiated a 20 year campaign to bring it back to television. I agree that the characters represented all that is best about an inclusive society. But I wonder how that one episode with 2 primitive peoples at perpetual war with each other would be viewed today. I'm thinking of the one that concludes with Kirk reciting the Declaration of Independence. Even as a kid, that choked me up a little bit when hearing it. Today 30% of high school kids polled are in favor of a reduction of freedom for a spurious security. The fact is that productions these days are made by business administrators rather than even studio heads. So the production landscape has become severely limited. And there's not enough of us old trekkies to keep it going. Think of what they did with that show in symbolic and artistic terms: showing the race conflict of the time as a fight between two men, each having a half/half skin color on opposite sides-- and when they spoke they reflected each other's image. That one was written by Harlan Ellison. Ellison is now one of the senior figures in s-f and fantasy, mostly as a consultant and editor. As a final aside, I wish I knew all the authors of those episodes who worked under pseudonyms. Major figures of that era wrote some of them under pen names.

I was thinking of the episode with the "Combs" and the "Yanks" when I wrote my last post. I remember that one, and how they did it in reference to the "Communists" and the "Yankess," on some planet with similar history, but one that endured an apocalyptic world war between them that destroyed everything and sent them back to the stone age. And now that you mention it, I remember the show with the black and white characters, and how the author used it to show absurdity of prejudice from skin color. No one could tell which was which until half way through the show when the leader of the lefties (or the righties, whichever) said that one race had black on the left side and the other was black on the right.

I saw Troy both in the theater and (lately) on HT. And, it's not a big movie in the classical sense - it's entertaining, and somewhat longish... Effects tends to tire out quickly, as soon as we get accustomed to them - but the sound on HT is great with this movie. Maybe you're right about these movies being made in the aftermath of 11/9. I think that the success of the Lord of the Ring movies also had a big impact on the producers - quite a few 'big battles and swords' movies lately.
